

Gracefully, the twins were swaying back and forth coming to the end of the light blue, rippled river and they washed upon the shore. In the distance, a wolf, that was coming by, caught a glance of the twins. Scampering over, she quickly pulled the two wiggling babies to safety. The wolf cared for the twins and kept them from the vicious creatures prowling for their food, like one of her own. In their own time, the fearless, adventurous twins soon grew used to living with the wolf and enjoyed it.

One fine afternoon, the twins were playing with each other when a shepherd was out walking by the river to get some fresh air and he spotted the twins with the wolf. The kind shepherd thought of taking the babies' as he and his wife had always wanted children of their own, and looking at them gave him hope. Kindly, the wolf let the shepherd take the twins home to his wife. The twins had no idea who this man was and they were a bit unsure about going with him as they gingerly followed closely behind him. As soon as he walked in the door, he showed his wife the adorable twins and after some hard thinking they both agreed on calling them Romulus and Remus.

The shepherd and his wife showed Romulus and Remus a fantastic way to live life. When they grew up they were also shepherds. One day, when they were herding their white, fluffy sheep, they saw one of the awful king Amulius' shepherds who started a quarrel with Romulus and Remus. Remus was

After a few hours, a she-wolf found the twin boys in a basket and pulled them out. For a few days, the she-wolf looked after the baby boys and protected them from many threats, which would have killed them. Without the wolf, the day old twins would have drowned in the threatening water.

One early morning, a young shepherd came across the twins and the wolf. He waited a minute for the wolf to leave and go hunt then he took the twins and popped them in a blanket so they would fall asleep. He took them to his wife and she was shocked to see how dirty the twins were. She quickly bathed them and filled their tiny, little bellies with warm food. As the twins slept she watched over them so, lovingly. For now she has two twin boys.

The boys were out herding their sheep when they came across the king's shepherds. Shocked, Remus threw a punch and was captured. Distorted, Romulus went to save his brother from the cruel King Amulius.
