Oceans can recover by 2050 if we act on climate change

Our oceans might be home to some of your favourite animals, from humpback whales to clown fish - but many marine species, habitats and ecosystems have been hit hard by human activity and suffered declines. But there is some hope.

Researchers writing in the journal Nature now predict that the ocean could bounce back by 2050 if major threats such as climate change, too much fishing and pollution are dealt with. According to the report, marine wildlife is very resilient - which means it is strong and has the ability to bounce back.
